NATIVE TONGUE RULE AT METROPOLITAN

Otto H. Kahn Says Opera Directors Insist on Foreign Languages Policy.

LAUDS MUSIC LOVERS HERE

Notables at Dinner of Society for Promotion of Grand Opera in English.

It was Otto H. Kahn who represented the directors of the Metropolitan Opera House at the annual dinner of the National Society for the Promotion of Grand Opera in English last night at the Plaza and told its members that as long as he and his present colleagues control the destinies of the Metropolitan there will be no opera there in any but its native tongue.

In defending his policy Mr. Kahn remarked to the apparent pleasure of his auditors that he believed there was no other city in the world that is able to engage artists capable of singing in foreign tongues and that it is only here that the populace is broad enough and catholic enough in its artistic attitude to demand grand opera in its original language.

It was quite a notable assembly of musical persons that gathered in the Plaza to celebrate the society's annual dinner and to hear pleasant things said about the future of an American national opera.

Reginald de Koven, president of the society, presided, and with him at the speakers' table were Walter Damrosch, David Bispham, P. Oriewold, Victor Herbert, A. Hertz, Otto H. Kahn, John C. Freund, C. H. Meltzer, K. Schindler, Mme. Anna E. Ziegler and P. Mackaye.

All of the speakers had one thing or another to say about the advantages of having foreign opera sung in English, though most of them seemed resigned to the advisability of having the Metropolitan continue its present policy of adhering to foreign languages.

Mr. de Koven was perhaps the most emphatic in advocating the singing of grand opera in English.

"We can dismiss the subject of opera sung in English," said Mr. Damrosch, "in a few sentences by asking who will say that the language of Shakespeare and Keats is not equal to any music."

From the point of enthusiasm the dinner was a complete success. No one seemed to take exception to the fact that their food was not rendered on the menu in English, but entirely in French. Considerable cause of rejoicing was found in the remark of Mr. Freund that last year the American people spent $500,000 for music in one form or another.

"And this amount," said Mr. de Koven, "is almost as much as the entire population of Europe spent in the same period, which should make us realize that the people of this country are starving for music."

Mr. Bispham and Mr. Meltzer spoke strongly in favor of grand opera in English.

Mrs. George R. Schieffelin gave a luncheon yesterday at her house, 22 West Fifty-second street. The table was decorated with red roses and ferns. Gerry, Mrs. Charles Phelps, Mrs. Charles Cooper, Mrs. William A. Perry and Mrs. Frederic H. Betts.

'ROMEO AND JULIET' AT CENTURY OPERA

Gounod's Work Brought Forward With English Text Once Again.

ORVILLE HAROLD HEARD

Performance One of General Merit and Audience Seems Pleased.

Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet" in English was brought forward at the Century Opera House last evening. The opera had not been heard here since it enjoyed one swift and passing representation at the Metropolitan Opera House on January 13, 1911, when the remarkable Mr. Smirnoff was the Romeo and Miss Farrar the Juliet. Owing to the extraordinary character of Mr. Smirnoff's art the opera was retired the next morning and no attempt has been made to revive it.

There is no startling novelty about its presentation in English, for it was in the repertoire of the Castle Square Opera Company at the American Theatre. It is not the most satisfying of works in the translation, but the sufficient reason that the French text departs widely from Shakespeare, and when this text is turned into the language spoken in this land the libretto discloses itself as something perilously near to literary bosh.

With all the advantages we are to gain from hearing operas in English we cannot rejoice in the presence of the poor stuff so carefully enunciated by some of the singers last evening. The sensitive lover of Shakespeare must have wished at times that he could not hear a syllable of the text. Even the literal translation, as in the perfect rendering of "Ah, desespoir! Capulet est son pere," could not be said to have captivating results.

But let this vexed question rest for a time. The performance brought credit to the Century Opera House, and this is the chief point. It was a good performance and it was really lacking in style, but it had certain musical excellencies. There was the added interest of Orville Harold's first appearance with the company. Though he made many loud assertions that it would not be a pretty good looking Romeo, except when he was trying to put his chin on his breast in accordance with some marvellous theory of tone production not yet rightly comprehended by such tenors as Caruso and Bonini, Mr. Harold's voice has not the brilliant quality it used to have and the chin on the breast may possibly be related to this condition.

But he sang Romeo in tune, with some art in phrasing and diction, and with an occasional note which must have satisfied every advocate of opera in English. He is a distinct acquisition at the Century, because he has had some stage training and knows how to get about and pose. Beatrice la Palme was a tolerably good Juliet. She sang with more taste than she has shown in other roles and she has shown in her role of Juliet a good deal of faithfulness to the part. Mr. Chalmers was the Mercutio. It can be said for him that his fresh voice was pleasing to hear and that he sang with good intent, but his Mercutio was a larger command of the resources of the stage than this young singer has yet acquired.

Mr. Adkins was a respectable Capulet, and Mr. Korman was the role of Friar Laurence. James Davis was commendable as Tybalt. The staging of the opera was good. The scenery, costumes and accessories were quite worthy of an opera house conducted on the plan of the Century. The audience was not large, but it seemed to be well pleased.
